I am currently applying for a Masters Program in Organizational Leadership and working as a deputy sheriff. I also hope to be the Sheriff or the Chief of Police one day. In order to achieve my goal, it is important that I have a good leadership philosophy that will help me connect with my subordinates and ensure that we have a good bond. Our leadership philosophy is an arrangement of convictions and standards that emphatically impact how we translate reality and guide how we comprehend the way the world works. It's our philosophy, our comprehension, and understanding of leadership, that influences how we respond to individuals, occasions, and circumstances around us. Numerous leadership speculations fall under theory as they manage information, convictions, ideas, demeanors, and qualities, for the most part in the ways that leaders ought to treat others, for example, their devotees and associates. In this way, while a leadership hypothesis, model, or idea may have substantial logical truths supporting it, a hypothesis regularly contends about the esteem that leaders ought to put upon their specialists or devotees.

For instance, the authoritative leaders put on their specialists is that the laborers can get something fulfilled for them. While then again, hireling leaders put the most incentive on others, as they need to serve them. Autocratic leaders, otherwise called totalitarian leaders, settle on choices without contribution from their subordinates. They are exceptionally taught and have an unmistakable perspective of where they, and their constituents, are going. They frequently guide their subordinates and how to do it without clarification. Here and there this is important, especially in eateries, assembling, or military circumstances. Democratic leaders, otherwise called participative leaders, search out a contribution from their subordinates. They consider meeting the objectives of the association to be a community oriented exertion from all members.

They have an unmistakable vision of where everybody ought to be and fuse the thoughts of their subordinates to make that vision happen. Laissez-Faire leaders, view their subordinates as completely equipped for doing their jobs without bearing and permit a high level of independence on their subordinates. Free enterprise leaders work to fabricate a solid group and let the group carry out their employments. This style of leadership is frequently found in ranges where there is a high level of imagination, for example, promoting organizations or organizations with a lot of innovative work. Web-based social networking work spots are frequently driven by a laissez-faire leader.

In my job profession, I have applied Democratic leadership philosophy to lead my team and to ensure that we connect and co-exist together. With the help of this leadership philosophy, I have allowed my subordinates to grow with me. They have a considerable amount of freedom in taking the important decisions, and they run their ideas by me first. I do not interfere in their work but keep a check to ensure that no mishaps occur. This leadership philosophy has allowed my team members to be more motivated as they consider themselves to be important members of the team. This has lowered my work burden also and also highlighted the different capabilities of other members of the team.
